It is, after all, Ralph the heir whose story Trollope is telling, and this story is complicated. Ralph's uncle, the squire of Newton Priory, has an illegitimate son, also called Ralph, and the uncle wants his own son to inherit his property. The two Ralph's are a study in contrast. The heir is frivolous, foolish, sometimes dishonest, and careless, both in his relationships with others and

Then there are several Ralphs: the (deceased) father, Ralph his son (the heir), and Ralph (not the heir) the son of the uncle Gregory! As they appear, Trollope has to interject "not the heir", or "the other Ralph". Ralph the heir is an extravagant, easy living young man who has spent himself into debt, and is faced with having to either sell his right to the family property, or marrying a wealthy tradesman's (a brooches maker cutely named Mr. Neefit) daughter.
