"Susan Sage Heinzelman's Riding the Black Ram: Law, Literature, and Gender explores the divergence between legal and literary discourses from the fourteenth to the eighteenth centuries. . . . She thus argues for a more nuanced view of power and powerlessness in relation to legislative and literary discourse."

Riding the Black Ram's coordinates of law, literature, and gender have been thought about together before, but Heinzelman manages to take them in new directions. Significantly, neither law nor literature is taken to be pure or monolithic here; it is their interpenetration that gives this study its force.
